When they reached France they were packed into trains, which stopped and started and crawled all day along the overcrowded tracks.

The country didn't look so different. People worked the fields just as the lads had done back home. Some of the workers unbent their backs and waved as the trains went by.

The soldiers finally arrived at a small station that had grown into a vast supply depot. Trains and trucks were being shunted and unloaded. Mountains of stores, horse lines and mule lines were everywhere and there was a babel of shouted commands.

Then at last they were off the trains and marching. Will felt good to be out in the fresh air and swinging along with his mates.
